IDENTIFIERS New Career Concept

ABSTRACT

The Office of New Careers (ONC) was established in July 1969, to help program agencies realize the full potential of the new careers concept as a service-delivery vehicle. However, without knowledge of the current, general status of the New Careers basic component, the Office could do little to begin its leadership role. Therefore, the element of training was selected as the initial point-of-emphasis on which to concentrate the search for information. The summary presented in this report is a compilation of responses received from every U.S. state and territory. It should serve to inform interested persons of the nature of the training being provided by institutions of higher education, and as a springboard for other inquiries into the new careers component-processes. Arranged in table format with interpretative narrative, the report presents information on such topics as the types and numbers of institutions offering training, and listings of titles of training offered by various institutions. ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Without the cooperative and timely responses to the Survey Forms by junior and senior college and university officials and staff, this summary could not have been as extensive or as illuminating. To them, we are deeply indebted.

Every member of the Office of New Careers staff has contributed in some degree to this report; however, Mrs. Catherine Hawkins has remained diligent throughout its preparation, and her efforts are especially appreciated.

FOREWORD

This study was undertaken by the Office of New Careers (ONC) as an initiative for fiscal year 1971. When the ONC was established in July 1969, its general mandate was to provide a focal point of leadership in the Office of the Secretary to assist the program agencies within and outside the Department to realize the full potential of the "new careers" concept as a service-delivery vehicle.

Without knowledge of the current, general status of New Careers' basic component-emphases around the Nation, the office could do little to begin its leadership role. Hence, the element of training -- one of the most vital phases of the new careers process -- was selected as the initial point-of-emphasis on which the office would concentrate its search for information.

The summary which follows is a compilation of the responses received from every State in and Territory of the United States. "Paraprofessional training" is being done in institutions of higher education. Perhaps this report will serve to inform interested persons of the nature of the training. It is also hoped that the summary will serve as a springboard for other inquiry into the new careers component-processes.

INTRODUCTION

Brief Historical Perspective

The concept of "New Careers" began its fermentation, for the most part, in the early 1960's. Conceptual emphasis, along with examples of how the concept could be translated into operating realities, was added with the publication of New Careers for the Poor,[1] in 1965.

Somewhat later (largely through the efforts of Congressman James H. Scheuer), legislative affirmation of New Careers was expressed via Title II, Section 205e, 1966, and Title I-B, Section 123, of the Economic Opportunity Act (EOA) in 1967.

Further strengthening of its original support of the philosophy inherent in New Careers was evidenced by Congress in 1969, when Part E was added to Title I of the EOA, along with appropriations to facilitate future action programs, supporting the new careers "idealosophy."

Although initially administered by the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), responsibility was later transferred to the Department of Labor (DOL), and what had previously been called "New Careers" became known as "Public Service Careers: Plans A, B, C, and D."[2]

Need for the Study

One of the roles of the Office of New Careers is that of coordinator for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's Public Service Careers-Plan B (Employment and Upgrading in Grant-in Aid Programs). In seeking to fulfill this role, the office had become aware of several administrative, operating, and collateral problems associated with new careers-type programs which needed further analysis. Among the areas noted were the following:

1. No title had been commonly adopted to describe persons who were "New Careers" or new careers-type program-participants. Such individuals were variously referred to as: "new professionals, aides, sub-professionals, trainees, paraprofessionals, new careerists, semi-professionals, new workers, and/or indigenous people."
2. Job and/or training titles had little uniformity within local communities, States, or regions.
3. Job titles -- where similarity, indeed sameness, existed -- were noticeably dissimilar when duties or tasks to be performed (in fulfilling the title) were enumerated.

4. Small autonomous groups of "paraprofessionals" (the title most commonly used by the Office of New Careers) had begun to organize themselves around two major purposes:

   a) To seek upgraded employment opportunities. This need was based on their having satisfactorily completed from one to two years -- sometimes more -- of on-the-job training, plus academic course-credit(s).[3/] In many instances, the General Education Development (GED) certificate or high school diploma and college credits, including an Associate in Arts degree, had been earned during the two-year period.

      With increased abilities to perform, new job assignments had been imposed without benefit of an increase in pay or change in job status. For the most part, entry-level titles and pay had remained static -- in direct opposition to and negation of the "New Careers" concept.

   b) To seek "fringe benefits" allowed other full-time employees working in the same agency/institution.

Although many paraprofessionals have sucessfully completed their "trainee status" (usually a period of up to two years), they have not been accorded "employee status" which entitles them to the usual worker benefits -- health coverage, vacation-with-pay, sick leave, and tenure.[4/]

5. Many paraprofessionals have not been "certified" for their job(s). Accrediting, licensing, and/or certification credentials have been unobtainable because:
   a) Professional groups and other accrediting associations/agencies have not recognized the paraprofessional as a member of the "team" of traditional health, education, or social work specialists (professionals).

   b) "Not enough workers are in these jobs; therefore, they can't be classified," has been stated by personnel and other employing officials as a reason for denying paraprofessionals recognition. Additionally, the workers have been told that "the merit system and/or civil service cannot recognize this (the work in "new careers") as a bona fide job; it is a 'trainee category'."

In spite of these deterrents, "New Careers" has been viewed as a viable concept.[5] Nevertheless, a persisting undercurrent of rejection of "new careerists" by persons who may be referred to as the "traditional professionals" suggested that the Office of New Careers should undertake several studies which might give insight into developments and restrictions pertaining to the utilization of paraprofessionals to deliver services in the areas of health, education, and welfare.

An inquiry into the kinds of academic training offered new careers-type employees and/or trainees by colleges and universities during the academic year 1970-71, was felt to be a logical starting point.

Procedures Used in Conducting the Study

Letters and Forms - With the realization that many academic institutions have a comparatively small administrative staff and faculty, it was felt that a lengthy questionnaire might not receive as much attention or bring as many responses as a somewhat-uncomplicated form which could be filled with minimum difficulty. Therefore, three forms (see appendix A, pages 75, 76, 77) were mailed each institution under a cover letter which briefly explained the nature of the information requested (see appendix A, page 74).

By design, definitions of "new careers" and "paraprofessional" were not included in either the cover letter or on the survey forms. It was assumed and hoped that this deliberate omission would elicit responses which would reflect academic views and definitions of the two, principal words and/or collateral concepts. Many responses confirmed our assumption -- and our hopes. Examples are the following excerpted comments:

> From California -- "...we have no specific program for training either professionals or paraprofessionals -- whatever they may be."
> From California -- "... has no para-professional training program for New Careerists and is, I believe, prohibited by law from offering such courses which are the proper tasks of the junior colleges..."
> From Georgia -- "...Pharmacy does not have paraprofessionals and consequently we do not have a program for them."
> From Indiana -- "Judging from your examples, I doubt that __________ College (omission is writer's) offers any programs which provide the type of training you are interested in."

From Michigan -- "The Dean and I agreed we do not have any such new career programs."

Expectedly, several responses postulated other varying versions and degrees of familiarity with and insight relative to the requested information. One example of this is excerpted from a Minnesota respondent:

> ...I have some reservations about the term "paraprofessional" and the unspecific use that is frequently made of it. The idea of educating for new careers is an exciting one. The word "paraprofessional" is too often used in a context, both among academics and employers, that connotes half-training, or worse, half-competence. Such misunderstanding surrounds many new ideas, but especially ones that are not clearly defined at the outset. For this reason, I would suggest that the Office of New Careers make clear distinctions between "new careers" that emerge from traditional four-year degree programs and "new careers" that have their own specially designed educational background. This would give focused momentum and dignity to the careers we are now calling "paraprofessional", and would create a climate of accepting specially skilled individuals as professionals in their own right. It would also encourage inter-disciplinary programs and "new career" development within colleges and universities.
> These kinds of distinctions may appear theoretical in the planning stage, but I believe they will have much to do with the success or failure of programs that are attempted.

A detailed response (a 37-page "Final Report of the Subcommittee on Allied Health Professions," March 25, 1971) was received from a university's College of Medicine in New York.

An analysis of all the comments made in response to our request will not be attempted here. Rather, a general summary is presented for consideration.

Mailing List - The Educational Directory, 1969-70: Higher Education,[6] was the source from which the Office of New Careers compiled its mailing list of junior (including community) and senior colleges and universities. Between the dates of March 1 - 10, 1971, letters, three forms, and franked, self-addressed envelopes to facilitate the return of responses were mailed to 2,794 institutions of higher education in 50 States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the United States. In most instances, envelopes were addressed to registrars, academic deans, and/or vice presidents in charge of academics.

Institution Categories - Colleges and universities have been classified (for purposes of this study) according to their highest level of academic degree-offerings noted in the Education Directory, above.

It is recognized that a given senior college or university may -- as the "parent institution" -- provide the umbrella from which satellite campuses and institutions may emerge and develop. In instances where the satellite campus is geographically located apart from the "parent," the highest level of academic offering (for each locality) may -- and very often, does -- differ from that of the umbrella institution. In this report, such differences have been noted; and institutions have, therefore, been categorized as follows:

Junior College	-- highest academic offering is less than a Bachelor's degree
Senior College	-- highest academic offering is less than a Doctoral degree
University	-- highest academic offerings are of the Doctoral level or beyond

Definitions - For the purpose of this Summary, the following definitions are used by the Office of New Careers:

"Paraprofessional" -- An individual who, without traditional academic and/or skill credentials, is employed and trained in accessory human service-delivery jobs -- specifically jobs in health, education, and welfare fields of work.

Such jobs complement and/or supplement the services of doctors, teachers, and social workers, thereby adding new dimensions in scope and quality to their professional expertise.

"New Careers" -- Theoretically, "New Careers" is a concept which is focused on improving the delivery of human services while, simultaneously, improving human resource-utilization with a concomitant reduction in manpower shortages for delivering services in the areas of health, education, and welfare

In practice -- and with proper application -- "New Careers" becomes a method for providing gainful, permanent employment augmented by training for heightened job performance(s) resulting in a worker's job and wage elevation(s).[7/]

"Positive Response"-- An institution indicating the offering of training in either health, education, and/or welfare was tabulated as having made a "positive response" to the survey.

"Negative Response"	--An institution which offered no training in health, education, or welfare was tabulated as submitting a "negative response" to the survey.
"Unidentifiable Response"	-- Replies were counted as "unidentifiable" for which neither the name of the responding institution nor its location could be established.

TABLE I: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

As previously mentioned in the introduction, the Office of New Careers distributed 2,794 requests for information on the paraprofessional training offered by colleges and universities throughout the United States, the District of Columbia, and U. S. territories. At the end of 60 days, following the mailings, 1,522 (54.5%) responses had been received.

The State of Nevada was the "best respondent" with a 100% return of its requests. Four colleges were contacted in that State.

In rank order, the largest numbers of contacts were made in the following states: New York (240), California (219), Pennsylvania (170), Texas (127), Massachusetts (114), and Ohio (112).

In serial order, the percent-responses (above 50%) were received from the following states: Washington, New Hampshire, Oklahoma and Montana (66.7% each), Nebraska, Utah, Maine, Indiana, Florida, Minnesota, and Texas.

All responses were categorized as "positive" or "negative." Puerto Rico and Alaska shared first place in their percengate of positive responses: Puerto Rico - 5 contacts, 5 responses; Alaska - 9 contacts, 3 responses, all of which were positive.

The State of Washington ranked second in its percentage of positive replies -- 82.6%; Utah ranked third (77.8%). The State of Montana had no positive responses -- 12 institutions were contacted, 8 of which responded, but no institution listed any training for "paraprofessionals" (as defined by the reporting institutions). More detailed presentation of the survey response data appears in Table I.

Data Implications

In examining the data regarding the survey responses, the Office of New Careers raises certain questions which seem to be implicit in the responses.

1. Although more than half of the institutions contacted submitted responses, could it have been assumed that slightly less than 50% of the responses would be positive?
2. If such an assumption could have been made, would it have been valid?

3. Could the knowledge that the concept of "New Careers" which is disposed to favor the poor, the disadvantaged -- ethnic minorities, largely, -- have been the basis for making assumptions that training by institutions of higher education would be slow in "catching on?"

4. Could the Office of New Careers have assumed that "higher education" cannot be designed for or shared with those whose education, for the most part, did not result from classroom experiences resulting in the receipt of at least a high school certificate or diploma?

TABLE II: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

Of the 760 colleges and universities responding, positively, to the survey, 397 junior colleges offered paraprofessional training. Perhaps this could have been anticipated inasmuch as many paraprofessionals begin their new careers processes usually without benefit of the "high school credentials." One would expect, therefore, that the junior or community college could more readily exert flexibility in its admissions policy.[8/] From a purely philosophical point of view, however, perhaps this should not be the case. One could assume that any educational institution ought be flexible, since education and learning are dynamic processes which, in theory at least, should preclude rigidity of methodology and/or content. With regard to the latter portion of the foregoing statement, survey results indicate that senior colleges and universities have been flexible to the degree that the training of paraprofessionals has become a part of their academic function.

While several colleges and universities indicated that the training which they provided paraprofessionals was "bootlegged" or hidden under other program titles, the inclusion of paraprofessionals as a part of their student body was proceeding, nevertheless.

The states of California (41), New York (35), Texas (29), and Illinois (26), indicated the greatest number of junior colleges which have training-offerings on paraprofessional levels.

Training at the senior college level was also highest in three of the four foregoing states; however, the rank order of the states underwent a slight change: New York ranked first, Texas, second, and California, third.

The State of Texas offered more university-level training for paraprofessionals (as interpreted by the respondents) than any of the other states or territories. The State of Indiana ranked second with its nine universities responding positively, followed by the State of Illinois (8), and the states of California, New York, and Ohio, with seven universities, each responding positively.

Of the states indicating the categories of training (health, education, and/or welfare) being offered to paraprofessionals, only Alaska indicated no training in the area of health.

In the area of education, only two states showed the absence of training: Louisiana and New Hampshire.

The weakest area of training for paraprofessionals was that of social services/social welfare. Respondents (totalling 39 colleges and universities) from eight states indicated a lack of this training. They were Alabama, District of Columbia, Hawaii, New Mexico, South Dakota, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

A more detailed presentation of the survey response-data appears in Table II.

Data Implications

Certain questions may be raised with regard to the responses. It should be pointed out, however, that Table II reflects "hard" data; accompanying the responses from many institutions were descriptive comments. These, too, imply -- and may be considered as -- "soft" data. Some of the following questions which were raised grow out of both kinds of data:

1. Should paraprofessional training have to be "bootlegged" by institutions of higher education?

2. Should curriculums -- special or otherwise -- have to be disguised in order that educational services can be performed for "untraditional students?"
3. Are professionals in the area of social work/ social services more rejecting of the use of paraprofessionals than are the professionals in the fields of allied health and education?
4. Are the non-participating (in this survey) institutions likely to have paraprofessional training in the areas of health, education, and/or social welfare?
5. In the area of health, is there ever likely to be training for paraprofessionals comparable to training for pre-professionals (Bachelor's degree levels)?

TABLE III: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

Many of the federal government's human services agencies are experiencing the decentralization process -- moving activity from the Nation's Capital outward into ten regional headquarters. In line with this trend, the Office of New Careers felt that a "breakout," by regions, of the amount of training offered in higher education institutions for paraprofessionals might serve to highlight new careers activity in broad geographical areas of the Country.

In terms of percent-of-response to the survey, Region VIII (Denver) ranked number one with 58.3% of the institutions contacted (total of 96) submitting replies sufficiently early to be included in the statistical summary. Region X (Seattle) returned the second highest percent (57.3) of the survey forms, closely followed by Region VI (Dallas-Fort Worth) with a response of 57.1%.

The largest number of colleges/universities that were contacted occurred in Region V (Chicago) -- a total of 539.

In first percentage-place with "positive responses" was Region X (Seattle) with slightly over 70%; in second place was Region VI (Dallas-Fort Worth) -- 60.6%; and third, was Region VII (Kansas City). This is not to imply that the largest number of colleges/universities offering training to paraprofessionals happened to occur in those three regions. Rather, this distinction (the writer believes) belongs in Region V (Chicago), followed by Region IV (Atlanta), and III (Philadelphia), with the respective number of positive responses as follows: 146, 129, and 81 institutions offering some type of paraprofessional training.

Data Implications

From the data in Table 3, the following questions seem appropriate:

1. On a regional basis, are there broad areas of the Nation which have had less exposure to the "New Careers" concept than others?
2. Are specific regions more rejecting of the idea of employing paraprofessionals than others?
3. Does the fact that some regions have little paraprofessional training in process indicate that there is a sufficient supply of professionals to deliver health, education, and welfare services to the geographic areas comprising the region?

4. Is it more likely that training for New Careers would occur only in urban areas within a region?
5. Could not the principles inherent in the New Careers concept be as applicable to rural areas as to urban? And relatedly, is it not factual that it is more difficult to induce professionals in health, education, and welfare to work in rural areas than urban/suburban localities?

TABLE IV: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

On a regional basis, Region V (Chicago) offers more paraprofessional training than any other. Regions IV (Atlanta) and IX (San Francisco) follow in respective order.

The area of social service/welfare training is the least available to paraprofessionals, geographically by regions. Only three regions -- V, VII, and X -- indicate training by all states within the geographic boundaries of the respective regions. Region II (New York City) also falls within this category, except for the Virgin Islands which was not a respondent to the survey.

Data Implications

A few questions may be raised with respect to the implications afforded by the data:

1. Can New Careers as a manpower development and utilization process be considered as having nationwide impact when viewed from a regional perspective?
2. Although some regions show a proportional lack of paraprofessional training in institutions of higher education, can it be validly construed that this situation indicates a geographically broad rejection of the new careers concept?

3. Are some regions more favorably funded for New Careers manpower development programs than are others?

TABLES V, VI, AND VII: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Preface

Below is an article originating in the Office of New Careers (ONC) as the result of its evaluative experiences with Public Service Careers (PSC) - Plan B Programs.

As a new careers-type program, PSC (DOL-funded) can be equated in several respects with the former OEO-funded "New Careers." It is because of their somewhat similar programmatic features that the article has been reproduced in its original form as a preface to the summary of listings of paraprofessional training titles in health, education, and welfare: Tables V, VI, and VII, respectively.

> After having heard the ONC lament the situation countless times, in numerous places, and among diverse professional ranks, the following will come as no surprise:
> Fifty-two different job titles are used to describe 17 similar entry-level classes of positions. However, many of the positions are essentially the same, regardless of job title. The 2,402 entry-level jobs fall into only three human service areas (health, education, and welfare). But hundreds of job descriptions list job functions for similar clusters of work as though health, education, and welfare were unrelated intradisciplinary areas of specialization.
> For example, 5 job titles for entry social service paraprofessionals are used to describe the same general job functions. The titles are:

Case Aide, Eligibility Worker, Caseworker, Social Service Worker, and Welfare Aide. The job descriptions for these 5 titles are fundamentally the same. Why not settle for one title?

The lack of basic uniformity in job titles, job descriptions, skill and academic requirements, as well as licensing and credentialing criteria can -- and probably will, unless remedied quickly -- defeat the philosophical and functional intent of the entire paraprofessional series of employment opportunities.

Surely this flaw in the "new careers" movement could not have occurred by design! Nevertheless, we wonder how willy-nilly even impulse can be!

TABLE V: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

Training of allied health personnel by higher education institutions occurs under many and diverse titles, as evidenced in Table V.

It should be noted that the survey form requesting allied health training-titles did not carry the word "paraprofessional." Rationale for this deliberate omission was twofold: 1) Health professionals have been reluctant to utilize "paraprofessionals" except in the traditional menial, low-paying, dead-end type work situations; and 2) With a compilation of the more or less acceptable allied health training-titles for largely "pre-professionals" (Bachelor degree-levels), the perusal of said titles could lead to future job or task analyses which might encourage the use of "paraprofessionals" to deliver allied services. This would be feasible, however, only if such re-structured or re-engineered jobs could command satisfying human-service duties accompanied by a financially-livable wage scale for the "paraprofessional job ladder and/or lattice."*

*The ONC definition for "job ladder and/or lattice" is: the series of job-progression steps -- vertically and/or horizontally from basic entry-level into the traditional first level of a professional job series -- with advancing titles, duties, and wages commensurate with skill and academic proficiency-development.

No attempt has been made in this Summary to "group" titles arbitrarily. Rather, each title has been listed as submitted by the respondent. In instances where titles are identical, the total number of such titles has been noted within a given institutional category (junior, senior college, or university).

Where "groupings" have been made by the ONC, the form is usually that of tallying "technician" and "technologist(s)" in one category; for example, title number 39 indicates that the titles, "Dental Hygiene" and "Dental Hygienist" were each tallied under a single listing, "Dental Hygiene(ist)," rather than two separate titles.

Many institutions submitting allied health training titles -- duplicates of the titles in Table V -- were very specific in qualifying: "For BA/BS degrees, only;" "Not considered as paraprofessional training." Such qualifying and definitive comments were counted as "negative responses" in the statistical tabulations, and are not included in Table V.

Data Implications

Many questions may be inherent in the Table V listing-of-titles. Among the ones of most import to the concerns of the surveying office are the following:

1. Are there as many certifying, accrediting, and licensing diversifications for allied health specialists as there are differing titles?
2. Are higher education curriculums in allied health fields as varying as the titles may indicate?
3. Cannot more uniformity be achieved in the training-titles of allied health specialists?
4. Are inderdisciplinary curriculum-influences adding to the proliferation of allied health training-titles -- and possibly, the licensing, certifying, and credentialing morass?
5. Is it not possible that allied health fields, other than nursing, can offer "approved" paraprofessional entry-level occupations in the allied health spectrum?
6. Have there not been sufficient "innovative" experimental allied health manpower-development "models" to have proved the feasibility of utilizing paraprofessionals to help to deliver health services?

TABLE VI: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

In the field of education, the responses indicated that paraprofessionals are being trained in skills which can augment those of professionals from nursery school through secondary levels. Respondents from each level of higher education (junior, senior colleges and universities) indicated that training which is being offered is geared toward some type of job ladder/lattice; for example, teacher aides seem to represent the entry-level positions, followed by teacher assistants. Beyond that point, however, the job structure becomes somewhat fuzzy, and it is difficult to separate -- by titles -- the third level of progression.

Data Implications

Although the area of education offers some degree of uniformity with respect to titles-of-training, can the following be implied:

1. That jobs for paraprofessionals need to be better defined in order that training can proceed more uniformly throughout the academic community?

2. That certification for paraprofessional types of positions can be smoothly accomplished so that certificates are transferable from one school district to another? Or from one state to another?

TABLE VII: SUMMARY OF THE DATA

Survey Responses

In neither the fields of health nor education were there as many differing kinds of training -- without duplication -- as the responses indicated for the field of social welfare. Titles which would seem to belong more properly to the areas of health or education or law are notable among the social welfare types of training for paraprofessionals.

Only in one title, "Social Work (one year for transfer)" was there a high degree of duplication by senior level institutions.

Data Implications

Can the following be implied from the data:

1. Is the field of social work/welfare too ill-defined to permit more uniform training-designs for paraprofessionals?
2. Are professional social workers sufficiently numerous that there is no need for paraprofessional complements?

CONCLUSIONS

Respondents from each level of higher education have indicated by their prompt and somewhat detailed responses to the survey of paraprofessional training that was offered in the academic year 1970-1971, that they are conscious of the trend toward supplementing the work of professionals with persons whose capabilities can be utilized to help increase the delivery of human services, specifically in the areas of health, education, and welfare.

Training in the allied health field(s) -- although not geared to an appreciable degree to paraprofessionals -- is open to further development. The barriers to certification, etc., seem formidable. Nevertheless, professionals in the field can do much to help to solve this problem.

Training for education-type skills is proceeding in institutions of higher education, although much of it is being "bootlegged."

In the field of social work, paraprofessional training is somewhat slow and poorly defined.

The Office of New Careers is deeply interested in the development of paraprofessional personnel to help to increase the quantity and quality of services in health, education, and welfare to our Nation's communities. To this end, the Office will cooperate fully with organizations, institutions, and individuals in strengthening the concept of "New Careers."

APPENDIX A

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20201

March 1, 1971

Dear Sir:

The Office of New Careers, which was recently created in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, to provide departmental leadership and coordination in the "new careers" area, is seeking information on the academic and skill training of persons for the allied health professions and the fields of education and social work.

The office is making a survey of the types of training being provided by junior and senior colleges and universities for paraprofessionals in human service areas -- specifically health, education, and welfare.

It will be appreciated if you will complete the enclosed forms and return them to this office at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely yours,

A. C. Alexander
